

Rita Robles is an educator and workers' rights activist. She is a strong voice in favor of policy solutions promote the health and wellbeing of workers in Mexico. Starting in 2003, Rita began working at the Center for Reflection and Labor Action (CEREAL), a Jesuit social program. At CEREAL, she accompanied workers seeking to form unions, and those pushing for more democratic practices inside existing unions, including the Oil Workers of the Mexican Republic, the National Union of Electricians, the National Union of Education Workers and the Union of Social Security Workers. This experience informed her understanding of the importance of linking labor rights to other fundamental issues in the lives of workers, including health, social security, education, housing and the environment. In 2010 Rita carried out research on migration and the right to health in Mexico. Since then, she has been an ardent advocate for economic, social and cultural rights. Rita is currently working at the Fray Matias Human Rights Center in Cordoba as the Mexico City Liaison for Policy and Advocacy.